What Do Your Bad Habits Say About You?

According to a study by North Dakota University, people own up to an average of seven bad habits—and the report could not find any one person with no bad habits.

Bad habits, such as nail biting, hair twirling and foot or finger tapping are actually anxiety-reducing behaviors, says Dr. Stephen Palmer, director of the Centre for Stress Management in London. "Bad habits help ease our anxiety when we find ourselves in frustrating situations that are difficult to tolerate," he says.

Generally, bad habits fall into the categories of nervous habits or boredom habits. Habits born of boredom are participated in to help pass time. Nervous habits are people's way of trying to distance themselves from a situation that makes them uncomfortable.

Nervous habits are often associated with nail biting, hair twirling and throat clearing. They are usually body based.

Boredom habits usually involve an object, for instance pencil tapping, doodling with a pen and even smoking. Generally these habits are participated in when a person is wanting to get something over with or is feeling impatient.

Here are what some of your bad habits might be saying about you:

- Foot jiggling: You are impatient. You just wish that people would get to the point. You want the other person to stop talking so that you can put your 2 cents in on the subject.
- Jaw clenching: You're experience stress, but you're denying it.
- Teeth grinding: Also a sign of stress and often indicates a fear of failure.
- Doodling: You are probably very bored and feel like you are better than other people. You need new challenges in your life.
- Throat clearing: You want to say something and you want people to listen to you, but you're not sure exactly what it is that you want to say.
- Hair twirling: You need attention or you're flirting with someone and you don't know how he or she is going to react.
