WARNING - Do This Before You Apply For A New Job.

These days it seems that employers are Googling potential candidates before they hire. It's just one more way of eliminating potential problems before employers welcome workers into their world. As a matter of fact, according to a recent survey of 100 executive recruiters by ExecutNet, 77 percent of recruiters reported using search engines in an attempt to find information on candidates. Of those who used search engines, 35 percent have eliminated a candidate because of information that was uncovered online. The year before that number was only at 26 percent, so the trend for hirers to search the Net before making an offer is growing quickly.

Here's something else interesting the survey revealed. Of 136 executives surveyed the majority (82 percent) expect recruiters to check their names out on a search engine—but only 33 percent have actually searched for information on themselves.

Here are a few tips from ExecuNet for improving your online image:

Be careful. When you're blogging or posting a comment online or creating a social networking profile. Think before you act. Would you really want someone who has the power to hire or not hire you to see what you've written? If not, you're better off not posting anything. Or posting under something other than your real name. Remember that anything anyone finds about you on the Net can be used to determine your character when you are being considered for a job.

Search for information about yourself. Check your name on Google, Dogpile.com and Yahoo! as well as any other search engines you think might turn some-thing up about you. And then check your name about once a month to see if anything appears. Tell the truth if you are questioned about something online. You don't want to be pegged as dishonest.
